

From the Editorial Board

Based at Columbia University in the City of New York, The Journal of Global Health is a new international student publication released biannually. The mission of this publication is to facilitate dialogue among students at the medical, graduate, and undergraduate level on innovative solutions to interdisciplinary global health issues from a variety of academic, cultural, and geographic perspectives. The health of human populations depends on the collective efforts of professionals from a vast array of fields, including scientists, public policy makers, and medical practitioners. The most pressing global health issues require increasingly interdisciplinary approaches to solving them. Despite substantial recent growth of interest in global health policy and research, there is currently a lack of dialogue among students on global health issues in an organized, academic fashion.

In this inaugural issue of The Journal of Global Health, we represent a wide range of perspectives from students throughout the world immersed in a variety of different academic disciplines relating to global health. Instructions for authors interested in submitting for our Fall 2011 issue can be found online at www.ghjournal.org.
